illegal rendition of two asylum seekers by the CIA. Perhaps I shouldn't be surprised that the day after I was arrested in London in December 2010, the British newspaper The Independent reported that the Swedish government had already participated in informal talks with the Americans about extraditing me onwards from Sweden to the USA.

Claes Borgström, the lawyer for the two women, is spokesman for the SDP on gender equality, and you'd have to say, with the best will in the world, that Sweden is one of the few countries in the world where hardcore feminism has entered the mainstream. Indeed, the decision to go to Afghanistan was mainly based on feminist principles: despite the women's movement's traditional anti-war stance, they deplored, understandably, the Taliban's treatment of women and sanctioned, less understandably, bombing as a way of opposing it. She is a well-connected figure within the feminist movement, as well as with the Social Democrats, where she was a prominent figure in Broderskapsrorelsen, the organisation that hosted my visit in August. Whatever whirlwind was whipped up, it led immediately to sinister events. I have been informed that A—— has deleted Tweets relating to me. In her last public one, on 12 December 2010, she wrote:

Expressen revealed, on 10 March 2011, that the police officer who first interviewed W—— was a friend of A——'s. The day after the women went to the police, in fact, A—— had given an interview to the same paper, in which she refuted any suggestion that she and W—— had been afraid of me. She said I was not violent and that, in both cases, the sex was consensual. From a police dossier, it appears that the women had not
