intended to file complaints and were simply seeking advice about STDs. They had said they had threatened me, in the telephone conversations, that they would go to the police if I did not immediately submit to an SDT test. The complainants' lawyer, Claes Borgström, stated in an article in the daily tabloid Aftonbladet that the women did not go to the police with the intention of reporting me; they just wanted me to get tested.

But there are other issues. In a 2006 blog entry called 'Rape?', A—— presents a scenario and finishes with a question: Is there any case in which a man has been convicted of rape even if the woman willingly started having sex? Against recommended protocol, neither of the women's interviews with police officers were recorded. Even prosecutor Marianne Ny believes such recordings should be made, as she stated in her comments to the judicial authority on the new sex offences law. According to police testimony from her friends, W—— only intended to find out whether the police could compel me to take an HIV test. According to one of the witnesses, who had been in constant contact with W—— throughout the time leading up to the police complaint, W—— felt as though she was being pushed around by others who had their own agenda. This conflicts with A——'s story in the Expressen article of 21 August 2010, where she is cited, and which claims she was contacted by W—— because W—— wanted to file a report for rape against me, and that A—— gave her support because she had had a similar experience. In the leaked report, which has not been approved by W——, the interviewing officer interrupted the interview because she could no longer concentrate when she found out that an order for arrest had been issued against me, shortly after the interview had started. According to her friend (M—— T——), who was also interviewed by police in connection with the case, W—— felt 'railroaded' by the police and by others around her.

I could go on, but won't. This is not the place to rehearse the entire case for the defence. Suffice to say the accusations were, from my perspective, both ludicrous and sinister. I have prepared a 46-page report on the case, on statements and inconsistencies. It is an exercise in scientific journalism, examining how untruths can feed through a whole pipeline of communication, resulting in an absolute falsehood threatening an individual.

As I said earlier, I claim no prizes for good behaviour during that week in Stockholm, but the rape allegations represent a smear that has already
