AFTERWORD

Julian's autobiography ends here, but the work of WikiLeaks continues.

*

14 January 2011 President Sine al-Abidine Ben Ali dissolves the Tunisian government and declares a state of emergency, then flees to Saudi Arabia. In Libya, his ally Colonel Gaddafi makes a speech condemning the uprising in Tunisia and claiming that protestors were led astray by WikiLeaks disclosures that had detailed corruption in Ben Ali's family and government.

22 January The Peruvian newspaper El Comercio receives a phone call from WikiLeaks offering them around 4,000 cables from the Lima embassy. Similar deals are made with media organisations around the world, as Cablegate goes global.

28 January As protestors begin a 'Day of Rage' in Cairo, Mubarak's beseiged government cuts off cellphone, satellite and Internet connections across Egypt. The eyes of the world are firmly upon the Middle East, as WikiLeaks continues to release cables from the region.

15 February In a speech at George Washington University, Hillary Clinton proclaims that Internet freedom is a 'foreign policy priority' for Barack Obama's government. She adds that, 'in order to be meaningful, online freedoms must carry over into real-world activism'. On the same day, the