1 June WikiLeaks continues to draw the media into new partnership arrangements, this time setting up a deal between the American magazine The Nation and the Haitian newspaper Haïti Liberté to publish cables concerning US relations with the Caribbean island. Cables reveal how Haiti's wealthy elite armed and deployed police in pro-Aristide neigbourhoods after the 2004 coup, effectively using the police as a private army; another suggests that American diplomats lobbied to keep Haiti's minimum wage as low as possible, opposing a move to raise it to $5 a day, while yet another confirms that the US, like other Western governments, were well aware that the 2010 Haitian elections were fraudulent.

2 June Julian wins the 2011 Martha Gellhorn prize for journalism. The judges describe Julian as 'brave, determined, independent: a true agent of people not power . . . WikiLeaks has been portrayed as a phenomenon of the hi-tech age, which it is. But it's much more. Its goal of justice through transparency is in the oldest tradition of journalism. WikiLeaks has given the public more scoops than most journalists can imagine: a truth-telling that has empowered people all over the world.'

21 June A November 2002 cable from the Vatican indicates that Venezuelan Catholic bishops were an integral part of the April 2002 attempted coup against President Hugo Chávez, even defying the Pope himself, who had asked the bishops to 'cool it' on political activism.

2 July Julian appears in London with the Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Žižek and the American journalist Amy Goodman. Žižek compares the impact of Cablegate to the story of the Emperor's new clothes: the power of the leaks comes not only or not even from the information they reveal, but from the fact that the information is confirmed for the first time from the horse's mouth and can no longer be denied. 'We all know that the emperor is naked, but the moment somebody says the emperor is naked; everything changes.'
