13 July, Julian's biological father, John Shipton, travels to London to support his son at his latest extradition hearing. He describes Julian as 'a great dissident . . . There are many intelligent people in the world, but most seem to be wicked, while Julian seems to have the moral courage and ability to carry his vision through. He seems to have an immense desire for justice in the world.'

As this book went to press, Julian remained under house arrest at Ellingham Hall, Norfolk.
