II: US MILITARY EQUIPMENT DATABASE (EXTRACTS)

In its raw form, as released by WikiLeaks, this is an extremely large database of around 2,000 pages of information on the provisioning of US troops in Iraq. Analysis of this database by WikiLeaks, released alongside the raw data, led to a number of observations. These ranged from the high material cost of insurgent improvised explosive devices (IEDs) – as evidenced by the amount of relevant equipment being purchased – to the ubiquity of cash in the chaotic post-invasion Iraqi economy, demonstrated by the army's purchase of 39 automatic cash-counting machines.

This extract is part of a much longer list of chemical weapons and US units employing them in Iraq.
