

Indian Army troops look out for insurgents in Kashmir, 16 September 1965. Pakistani-backed raiders had started to infiltrate Kashmir on 5 August with the aim of disrupting lines of communications and inciting insurgency. By 6 August, the Indian Army had started tracking and hunting down the raiders. (Pictorial Parade/Archive Photos/Getty Images)

Operation Gibraltar

After its supposed success in the Rann of Kutch, Pakistan put into action Operation Gibraltar to seize Kashmir by infiltration and sabotage. For this, Pakistan's 12 Infantry Division had trained and equipped 30,000 Pakistani soldiers and irregulars who were organized into nine task forces and clothed in civilian garb. The infiltration by these Pakistani forces started on 5 August, with the aim to block the Srinagar–Jammu and Srinagar–Kargil roads to isolate Srinagar, and thereafter instigate an uprising in the state to take control of that city. The Pakistan Army even employed its artillery to help the infiltrators, but the plan failed because of a lack of local support and the immediate reaction of the Indian Army, which was able to contain