the infiltrators within 15 days. It was also necessary, however, for Indian forces to seal the infiltrators' ingress and egress points.

To do so, the Indian Army captured tactical features along the infiltration routes, including the Kargil heights, Tangdhar in the Tithwal sector and Haji Pir Pass, the last in a daring operation conducted by 1 PARA on 28 August 1965. Also, key positions in the Kishenganga Bulge were captured by 104 Infantry Brigade. The loss of Haji Pir Pass and positions in the Kishenganga Bulge were severe setbacks for Pakistan and effectively sealed the fate of Operation Gibraltar, though some groups of infiltrators remained in the valley. Even while the Indian Army was in the process of clearing them, Pakistan launched the next phase, Operation Grand Slam, on 1 September with the aim of capturing Akhnur and severing Indian lines of communication to Kashmir.

Operations Grand Slam and Riddle

The offensive was launched by Pakistan's 12 Infantry Division, and it gained initial success against the Indian Army's 191 Infantry Brigade (10 Infantry Division). Inexplicably, Pakistan paused its offensive on 3 September, losing momentum. When Pakistani forces resumed their advance, the situation became very critical for India, and 191 Infantry Brigade was forced to retreat to Akhnur. Only on 10 September was the Indian Army able to stabilize the situation, with Pakistan remaining in control of the captured areas as far as and including Jaurian.
