Madhumati. The division's 7 Mountain Brigade, tasked with capturing Kushtia, was unsuccessful. At this stage, 62 Mountain Brigade, tasked with advancing towards Faridpur after capturing Magura, was diverted to Kushtia. This delayed II Corps' advance, and it crossed the Madhumati only on 15 December. II Corps' reserve formation, 50 (Independent) Parachute Brigade, fought in a brief skirmish at Khajura, north of Jessore, on 8 December, but was pulled out the next day for transfer to the west.

In the north-western sector, XXXIII Corps launched 202 Mountain Brigade and 340 Mountain Brigade Group from the north towards Dinajpur and Rangpur. Advancing from the west, 20 Mountain Division was to bypass Hilli and then swing south to capture Bogra. The two brigades on the northern thrust lines reached Dinajpur by 9 December and tied down the Pakistani defences at Saidpur and Rangpur. On 4 December, 20 Mountain Division captured Charkai and thereafter reached Hilli, but 202 Mountain Brigade was unable to capture it. The division's 340 Mountain Brigade Group attacked due south towards Gobindaganj and Bogra, thereby unhinging the Pakistani defences at Hilli, which fell on 11 December. Indian troops made contact with the Bogra defences and established a roadblock due south of Bogra by 14 December, but the main Pakistani defences held on until the end of hostilities. A plan to move 340 Mountain Brigade Group, a tank squadron and an artillery battery across the Jamuna could not be executed. Much of XXXIII Corps' offensive power lay idle for far too long and Pakistani troops still held Rangpur, Saidpur, Dinajpur, Natore and Rajshahi when the ceasefire was announced.
