Meanwhile, 61 Mountain Brigade, advancing on the Comilla–Mainamati–Daudkandi axis in a wide outflanking move, captured Daudkandi on 10 December, thereby compelling the Pakistani forces to vacate defences at Lalmai and Comilla and fall back on Mainamati. This facilitated the advance of 23 Mountain Division, operating on the Himatnagar–Laksham–Chandpur axis, which encircled and destroyed the Pakistani defences at Laksham. By 9 December, 23 Mountain Division had captured Chandpur; the division crossed the Meghna and reached Dacca on 14 December.

Further south, Indian forces made a two-pronged attack on Chittagong. The northern and southern hooks were conducted by 83 Mountain Brigade and Kilo Force respectively. Pakistani forces in Chittagong surrendered on 16 December , the same day on which the lead elements of IV Corps reached Dacca.

The northern sector, bound by the Meghna in the east, the Jamuna in the west and the Padma in the south-west, was given the lowest priority by both sides. Pakistan's only brigade in the sector held strongpoints at Jamalpur and Mymensingh, while the Indian Army had earmarked 101 Communication Zone with 95 Mountain Brigade and FJ Force (one battalion only) for the offensive. The Indian forces attacked on two axes, with 95 Mountain Brigade advancing on the Kamalpur–Jamalpur–Madhupur axis and FJ Force on the Haluaghat–Mymensingh axis . On 4 December, 95 Mountain Brigade captured Kamalpur.

By 9 December, 167 Mountain Brigade Group was allotted to this sector and all was set for the capture of Jamalpur. Meanwhile, FJ Force outflanked and captured the Pakistani position at Haluaghat. Advancing rapidly, it captured Mymensingh on 11 December and Madhupur on 12 December. As IV Corps approached Dacca, the Pakistani troops defending this sector withdrew to meet the threat from the east, but in the process opened up the route to Dacca from the north. On 11 December, 2 PARA conducted a parachute drop at Tangail further south of Jamalpur. Indian forces established a link-up on 12 December and the final push was made for Dacca. It was FJ Force (strengthened by two battalions) which made it first to Dacca, on 16 December.
