D1: Soldier, 4 SIKH, Barkee, Lahore district

This Sikh soldier wears a turban covered with camouflage net, the olive-green cotton uniform, ammunition boots with anklets and standard web equipment and is armed with a 7.62mm 1A1 battle rifle. Seeking to replace the veteran .303 SMLE bolt-action rifle, the Indian Army was already looking for a new rifle in the late 1950s and it finally selected the 7.62mm FN FAL battle rifle, known as the 1A1 in Indian service. Production started in 1960 but it was not adequate to equip all units when the war against China broke out in 1962. By 1965 a substantial number of units had been equipped with these rifles.

D2: Major General Rajinder Singh, 1 Armoured Division, Punjab

The Second Kashmir War saw some of the most intense armour battles after World War II as the two adversaries clashed on the plains of Punjab. India's 1 Armoured Division (2a) was part of I Corps' offensive in the Sialkot sector. The division, commanded by Major General Rajinder Singh, faced stiff opposition from the Pakistani 6 Armoured Division when operating in the Phillora–Chawinda sector. The Indian division's four armoured regiments claimed to have destroyed more than 170 Pakistani tanks during the war, while Indian losses were 29 tanks destroyed and another 41 damaged. The major general wears a black turban with tank-crew goggles and a sunshade. He is wearing the medal ribbons but no name tab, though he has the 'Black Elephant' formation sign on his left shoulder.

D3: MMG crewman, 4 Mountain Division, Asal Uttar

This crewman of a water-cooled .303 Vickers MMG is dressed in the olive-green uniform and wears a Mk II helmet with camouflage net. Armed with a 9mm Mk III Sten SMG, he carries the crew's rangefinder. After launching its offensive on 6 September, India's XI Corps (3a) faced a riposte by Pakistan's 1 Armoured Division and 11 Infantry Division in the Khem Karan sector. This prompted the Indian Army's 4 Mountain Division to occupy a hastily prepared defended sector in the Asal Uttar area, with approximately 3½ infantry battalions plus units of 2 (Independent) Armoured Brigade. The formation held firm, beating back repeated attacks by Pakistani armour and infantry during 8–9 September. The situation was stabilized by 10 September as the Pakistani armour suffered heavy losses in which the Indian infantry played a major role. It is estimated that Pakistan lost 97 tanks, including 72 Pattons, during the battle.
