CHAPTER 3
Always Together

Khurram's father, Jahangir, had little interest in waging war and conquering new lands. He was more interested in painting and natural history. He also drank heavily and took drugs. He let one of his wives run the government.

It was up to Khurram to keep the empire from falling apart. He commanded the armies and often led troops to put down rebellions.

Women hardly ever went with soldiers to battlefields. But Khurram and Mumtaz were too much in love to ever be parted. Mumtaz was always with her husband, even when the danger was very great. In their first seven years of marriage, she gave birth to seven children—most of them while she was in a tent close to a battlefield.