CHAPTER 2
Searching for Signs

When the Thirteenth Dalai Lama died in 1933, Buddhist monks displayed his body so that Tibetans could visit and offer their respects to him. The monks placed the Dalai Lama so that his head tilted toward the south. But one morning, they found his face had turned toward the northeast! When it happened a second time, the monks thought it might be a sign.

They believed that the Dalai Lama's soul would be reincarnated (reborn) in the body of a new person. Perhaps this was a sign that their next leader would be found living in a region to the northeast.