

Tibetan officials formally announced that the boy coming to the capital was the next Dalai Lama. Hundreds of people began lining the caravan's path as it got closer to Lhasa. They were eager to meet Lhamo.

The caravan stopped at a monastery about three days away from Lhasa. There, Reting Rinpoche welcomed him. Even though Lhamo was so young, he was already behaving like a holy leader, blessing the many people who came to see him. The group grew as Reting and more monks joined the caravan. For the last part of the journey, Lhamo rode in an even fancier palanquin, no longer carried by horses, but carried on the shoulders of eight men.
