

Lhamo was then brought to a temple in the middle of the city. His hair was shaved off, like all the other monks. He was also given his new name. Lhamo would now be known as: Jamphel Ngawang Lobsang Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso, or just Tenzin Gyatso (say: TEHN-zihn gee-OT-soh) for short. But each of his many names had a special meaning. They made it clear to the Tibetan people that this little boy was holy, a good speaker, compassionate, and had an ocean of wisdom.

After three long months of rough travel, the Tsering family was brought to a beautiful place to rest—the Norbulingka Palace, one of two palaces in the city. They were treated like royalty. Lhamo, who was still
