

The palace was much fancier than the small village he knew so well. Curious and playful, he explored his new home. One day, his mother found him opening many of the trunks he had found in his rooms. The belongings of the Thirteenth Dalai Lama had been stored inside. He said he was looking for his teeth! Finally, he found the box he had been looking for. When he and his mother opened it, they found the dentures of the previous Dalai Lama! Lhamo was just a little boy, but those around him saw this as further proof that he was truly the next leader of Tibet.

Lhamo lived in the Norbulingka Palace for four months. Then, on February 21, his servants woke him early. Like any child, he complained that he wanted to sleep longer. But they told him it was an important day. He would be moving into the Potala Palace.

Once again, the young boy found himself as part of a grand procession, riding in a golden palanquin, this time from one palace to another. Servants
