

Even though he was still very young, everyone called him His Holiness. They spoke formally to him, bowed low, and even lay down on the ground in front of him. When he did something wrong, the monks didn't want to punish him. He was their leader! So the tutors would often punish poor Lobsang instead.

The Dalai Lama spent winters in the Potala Palace. In summers, he returned to the Norbulingka. He liked the summer palace so much more! It was smaller and had only about 350 rooms instead of 1,000. Norbulingka means "jeweled garden." And the Dalai Lama played in its gardens of flowers and fruit trees. He took his small boat out onto the pond and dropped food to the fish while the adults watched him from shore.
