the Norbulingka palace and monasteries. They were now in charge of Lhasa.

As they reached India, the group had more than tripled in size to about 350 people. On March 31, 1959, they were welcomed by Indian guards at the border. The Dalai Lama was sick with a high fever. He could hardly stay on his horse. But he had finally arrived in India. And Prime Minister Nehru was willing to help the Tibetans. The country of India would protect them.

Before the dramatic escape, people in the rest of the world didn’t know much about Tibet. The country’s high mountains and ancient traditions had kept it separate from outsiders. But word had spread about the Tibetan