CHAPTER 7
Hoping for Peace

The Dalai Lama and his people were now living in exile, which means that they had been forced to leave and could not return home. His new home in India was much smaller than the palaces of Tibet. He no longer had hundreds of servants, advisors, and monks surrounding him. He wasn't carried around in a palanquin. He walked among his people. The Dalai Lama didn't miss the fancy ceremonies. Buddhist monks were expected to live simply, and now he did.
