

While he spread his message throughout the world, the people in Tibet were still suffering. The Chinese government controlled every part of the Tibetans' lives. They continued to erase Tibet's culture, language, and religion. If anyone was found with a picture of the Dalai Lama, they were arrested and thrown in jail. No one could speak out against the government. As more Chinese immigrants poured into Tibet, their population grew to outnumber the Tibetans. More Tibetans now lived safely outside Tibet than in it. The Dalai Lama was still working to reach a compromise with China. But the Chinese government would not agree to it.

As years passed, some Tibetan people began to leave India. The Tibetans-in-exile spread to all parts of the globe. The Tibetan government, which calls itself the Central Tibetan Administration, held its first democratic elections in 2001. And Tibetan people all over the world elected their own officials.
