

Their “country” did not have specific borders, but it had a population of Tibetans who still believed in their homeland, no matter where they lived.

The Dalai Lama has written more than one hundred books, won awards from more than thirty countries, and holds prayer gatherings with hundreds of thousands of people. He speaks and writes about looking inward to find happiness with one’s self and also looking outward to help others throughout the world.

In 2011, the Dalai Lama made an announcement. He was stepping down as the political leader of Tibet, ending a more than 350-year-old tradition. He would still be the spiritual leader, but he felt that the time of one person holding all the political power in a country had passed. Instead, he felt Tibet should become a democracy, like so many other countries in the world. Tibet would be led by the Central Tibetan Administration, with leaders elected by the people.
