

While most Tibetans in Tibet don’t remember a time when the Dalai Lama lived among them, he is always thinking of them. And he constantly reminds the world of the struggles happening there. He works hard to keep Tibetan culture alive in exile.

The Dalai Lama says: “We are all human, all seven billion of us. In this respect, we are all one hundred percent the same.” He believes that no matter what country people are from, what language they speak, how much money they have, or which religion they practice—we are all human. We should have compassion for one another. Compassion, he says, is kind and gentle, but it is also powerful. He believes compassion is not just for the people you love, but also for your enemies. He even calls the Chinese people his “brothers and sisters.”
