Chapter 7
Quitting India

The British had to listen to Gandhi after seeing how he had united the Indian people. They also had to face the harsh reaction of the rest of the world. The government received telegrams from all over the world demanding that Gandhi and the other INC members be released from jail. Lord Irwin, the viceroy in India, met with Gandhi. Together, they reached a truce. Gandhi would call off the civil-disobedience campaign, all prisoners would be released, and Indians could make their own salt.

Gandhi was ready to represent the Indian National Congress in London for the Round Table Conference of 1931. He would speak in support of an independent India.
