

Gandhi still fought for the Indian people while in jail in Yeravda. The British government was planning to keep the untouchables separate in courts and within government systems. Gandhi did not want the untouchables to be considered separate from the rest of Indian society. To protest this law, Gandhi announced that he would not eat until he died. Kasturbai, who was being held at Sabarmati Prison, was transferred to Yeravda Prison to be with her husband. Doctors examined Gandhi and felt certain he was about to die. The government quickly agreed to Gandhi's terms and he ended his fast. They did not want to risk the death of such a famous and beloved man.

In 1939, the British entered World War II. Gandhi was upset that the British had not even discussed it with the Indian National Congress. He told British government officials that India would only cooperate if Britain promised them independence. Gandhi wondered why India should fight for
