expense of other priorities. Dharma is key since it ensures the maintenance and development of the people in harmony with the progress of society. Dharma went beyond the literal concept of religion and was not merely for Hindus: indeed, all places of worship, whether temples, churches, or mosques, should instil in the populace the practice of dharma.

All four Purusharthas are co-dependent, and together form a path to moksha. If a man is properly assembled as a function of the four Purusharthas, so will society be successfully constructed. When an individual starts on the path of fulfilling his Purusharthas, he comes into contact with a larger group of people, develops the willingness to work for others, and experiences shared joy and mutual understanding. Families, communities and nations are born of this. But the excessive individual freedom of the capitalist West and the collectivisation of the communist East had eroded this consciousness, which was now under threat in India.

For Upadhyaya, the Western theory of the social contract had to be rejected, for society is not a club that individuals can seek membership in. 'Society,' Upadhyaya writes (in terms similar to his conception of a nation), 'is not a institution created by individuals coming together. A society is born…. [T]he relation of a society to its individuals is the same as that of an organism and its limbs, or that of a tree and its branches, leaves and flowers. The question of who is more important of the two, society or individual, is not worth considering.'[53] In Bharatiya culture, we can neither ignore the individual nor lose sight of society's interests.

Society is a living organism, and has its own mind, intellect, and soul. Thus, it must have its own Purusharthas. The Samashti Dharma (dharma of society) embraces all that helps sustain the individual and the society. When applied to Bharat, it involves guarding the bonds of affinity to the motherland—an amalgam of common history, culture, clothing, and creed. The Artha Purushartha of society should be against prabhav, social bifurcations through granting high social status to the rich, as well as against abhav, or dependence on other nations (thus self-reliance and egalitarianism are vital). The Kama Purushartha of society embodies the nation's desires, such as the restoration of an undivided
