House (Rajya Sabha) and Lower House (Lok Sabha) of Parliament, there would be only one National Guild in which 1,000 representatives from all over the country will discuss the problems of India. In the National Guild, 500 representatives would come through territorial representation, while 500 would come through functional representation.'

Human rights are another example of the Westernisation of the Indian constitutional system, according to Govindacharya: 'There cannot be any rights without checks and balances. If the Constitution gives us fundamental rights, it mentions fundamental duties too. But no one cares about that. Rights and duties should be seen in relation to each other. To exercise your rights, you should follow your duties. No one can exercise absolute freedom.' As Deen Dayal Upadhyaya had argued, 'fundamental duties, not just rights, must also be incorporated.' Secularism, like human rights, will have to go: it 'implies opposition of Hindus and appeasement of Muslims or other minorities. We should get rid of this word as soon as possible. It is completely irrelevant in the Indian context.'

Deen Dayal Upadhyaya's inspiration crops up again in the Hindutva rejection of the Western word 'socialism' in the Preamble of the Constitution. 'We have a better word—of Indian tradition—to express the spirit of socialism. It is [Upadhyaya's coinage] antodaya. Antodaya means antim aadmi (the last man).' Similarly democracy is a troubling term because it implies political contention. 'Instead of competitiveness, consensus and collectiveness should be the spirit of the democracy', says Govindacharya.[67] Shades of Cuba again!

The process of incorporating such Hindu concepts seems to have begun: 'We are doing it very silently. Discussions and debates have been taking place for some time. What I told you above are the initial outcomes of the debate', Govindacharya confirms. 'There may be many gaps which need deliberations, and a cool, calm, dispassionate discussion needs the right atmosphere and a mechanism. However, this is just not possible in the media glare.' Would a Hindutva-inspired revision of the Constitution, for example, move the issue of cow slaughter from the Directive Principles of the Constitution, where it is linked specifically to the preservation of milch-cattle and scientific principles of animal
