I remember sticking to these guidelines when I attempted the test. After it was over, the fingers on my right hand hurt from all the writing I had done at breakneck speed.

It was like a marathon of tests that day. The WAT started right after the answer sheets for the TAT were collected. The lesser the time, the lower the chances for someone to outsmart the tests. I didn't even get time to drink water from the glass kept on my desk. Sixty words were flashed on the screen, each for a duration of fifteen seconds. We were required to write the first thoughts that came to our minds on seeing each word. Do not mistake this test for a sentence-making exercise. Do not falter in the very approach to this particular test, Papaji had strictly advised me. Of the sixty words, some words were related to intellectual quotient, some to social attributes, some were meant to reflect effectiveness as part of a team, while some were aimed at depicting a candidate's dynamism. Responses to these words would be analysed by psychologists. These responses, including the responses of the previous test, would help draw a final descriptive personality of each candidate. To attempt this test and follow Papaji's guidelines at the same time in only fifteen seconds per word seemed rather difficult. Somehow, I managed to attempt fifty-three words in the given time. Not bad! Hema could attempt only forty, she would tell me later.

Right after the WAT, we had to take the SRT. Hardly a moment of respite was allowed. I cracked my knuckles and neck, preparing myself for what was coming next. The SRT is aimed at analysing a candidate's spontaneous and instinctive responses to unfamiliar, stressful and life-like situations. Booklets containing incomplete statements were distributed to us, a total of sixty situations for candidates to complete. We were given thirty minutes, and precisely thirty seconds each to complete a single situation. The rules were simple, Papaji had told me. A response to a situation/statement should be given in a methodical manner, which is brief but complete in all its aspects; for example, if you see a fire incident, you must start by calling the fire brigade, followed by gathering people nearby and organizing them into parties, such as the rescue and fire-extinguishing parties, some to arrange for transport to take the injured to the hospital, then others to inform police
