then I had Anuradha to motivate me and teach me everything that I had missed. Both of us had lost a lot of weight in those four weeks. Our skin tone had darkened, and our cheekbones and jawlines would shine on a bright sunny day. It was the same with every cadet. I wondered if my own parents would recognize me. I had not spoken to them in a while and missed them a lot. I didn't even get enough time to write to them frequently. After the initial few troublesome days, I had finally adjusted myself to the academy's way of life in those four weeks. But waking up in the early morning was still a pain for me and I would often look at the stars and ask, 'Why did I come here?' But the airplanes soaring against the dark blue sky would remind me of my purpose. Yet, there was one thing that stood between me and my dream of flying—the exam. And even until the morning of the exam, I wondered if I was fully prepared. But whether I would fly or not, only the results would tell.
