I would be completely honest and that I would say exactly what I had said at the King Commission. My interviewers obviously had the transcript of my testimony to the King Commission with them, and they were clearly hoping that I'd say something contradictory to what I'd said before. They also seemed to be fishing for the names of other Indian players or bookies whom I might accidentally implicate.

Fortunately I was on top of my game and, according to Pete, answered their questions even better than I did the King Commission's. What, by the way, Pete 'neglected' to tell me (notice how I'm giving him the benefit of the doubt here) is that he had a full legal team on standby if the Indian police did arrest me. He'd got the top legal firm in Delhi on full alert just in case. And that's exactly why Pete is my lawyer.

Some of the questions were completely irrelevant. I mean, completely off the topic – probably a tactic to throw me and make me lose focus. But I just answered as honestly as I could and repeated exactly what I had told the King Commission. Interestingly, when Pete asked any questions about the mysterious audio tapes of Hansie that had started this whole investigation, Narayan would duck and dive. Needless to say, no tapes were produced at this meeting. At the end of it all, Pete shook Commissioner Narayan's hand and said, 'If you still need to question us after this, you can do so any time.' We haven't heard a word from them since.

The press were waiting for me outside, but Faizal was great and made sure I got into the car without being hassled. Straight afterwards, Peter and I went for lunch with the High Commissioner. Of course we had some butter chicken – my staple diet in India – and a bottle of wine. Ja, something of a staple diet as well, I guess. I was relieved that the whole drama with India was now over, but it would still take a while before I could put the whole episode truly behind me.

Of course, it didn't help that Narayan then held a press conference after our meeting, where he hinted that I had implicated more Proteas players in the whole drama. We first got wind of this at the above-mentioned lunch when Peter got a call from Hansie's lawyer, Leslie Sackstein, who wanted to know what the hell I had said. It was pure political opportunism on Narayan's part – clearly the guy was looking for as much media mileage as he could get. Certainly the meeting he was talking about was a very different one from the meeting Peter and I had just attended.
