The next day, once we were back in Mumbai, Pete got the Proteas together to tell them what had really gone down in front of that police panel. His reassurance worked and my teammates and I could finally get on with what we do best: play cricket. Even that, though, was tougher than I anticipated. The whole affair preyed on my mind a little during the ICC Champions Trophy over the next couple of weeks.

To this day I'm not sure whether the King Commission managed to uncover everything. As I've mentioned, when the story first broke, Mark Boucher revealed that Hansie had also once approached some of the other players, Bouchie included. And that came as news to me. This was happening right under my nose and I wasn't even aware of it.

Is it still going on in cricket today? Unfortunately, looking at the fun and games that have gone on with the Pakistan team in England recently, it seems that it's still around. It doesn't totally surprise me, to be honest. I've watched a couple of games on the subcontinent and I've had my suspicions. But I obviously can't be sure. Match fixing has certainly not come up in any team I have been a part of since Hansiegate.

One thing I do know for sure, and that is that it is impossible to fix a game without having 90 per cent of the team in on the deal. You could get a player to underperform in order to influence a particular spread bet, as allegedly happened with Messrs Asif, Amir and Butt, but as for fixing an entire game, no way. When we were asked to chuck that game in 1996, Hansie had an actual plan on how we would go about it – targets would be set, right down to what the score had to be and how many wickets had to be down by a certain over. That's the level of strategising required, and that's why the majority of the team's buy-in is necessary.

But there's not a chance of that happening now.

Apart from the fact that players are just not prepared to risk their careers – and remember, these days, with tournaments like the Indian Premier League, we make a lot more money than we did a decade ago – the ICC's anti-corruption laws make it practically impossible for players to fix a game. Players are not allowed to use their cellphones at stadiums any more, they no longer share rooms with their teammates, and the ICC has special security personnel present at all games to ensure that everything stays above board.

One could say, if one looked at it from a different angle, that if it weren't for Hansie and me, those security guys wouldn't have jobs, nor would the
