long-off. Because I'd danced down the pitch for the first two deliveries, I decided to stay in the crease for the next delivery and play Van Bunge from there. I was like, 'Let me just hang back to see where he bowls.' Van Bunge obviously thought I was coming down the pitch again, and he dropped the ball a bit shorter, outside off-stump.

Now, along with most batsmen, I would usually cut that shot and go for a four, but usually you find a sweeper on the boundary and you only get one. In that split second I decided to flat-bat the ball straight back over his head. As I said, the boundaries were short. It was risky, but I absolutely nailed it and hit another six.

It was the key shot in that over – that unorthodox six set me up for the rest. The poor Van Bunge didn't know where to bowl from then on. He tried to dart the fourth ball in quicker and flatter, but I was expecting something along those lines, and I posted it over deep mid-wicket. The fifth ball was short outside off-stump, and I was able to rock back and pull over wide-long-off. One more to go …

At that moment, Jacques came up to me and said, 'Well, you've got five now; there's no need for a sixth.' Funny. I was like, 'Bugger that, boet. I'm going for another one.' I mean, how many such chances do you get in international cricket? 'You've got five now, there's no need for a sixth' … he must have been having a laugh.

It's odd, but I just knew that the sixth delivery was going to go for a six as well. And the prospect of actually getting six sixes in a row wasn't making me nervous at all. In fact, I didn't even realise I was on the brink of a record, to be honest. I thought Sir Garfield Sobers had already done it, but I later learnt that his six sixes had occurred in a first-class county game for Nottinghamshire against Glamorgan and not in an international. So ja, I felt a certain inevitability about that final ball. And I think Van Bunge did too. He bowled it full outside off, and again I lofted it over the mid-wicket boundary for six.

Ba-da-boom. I became the first person to hit six sixes in succession in an international.

I didn't quite know how to celebrate, as I'd already got my half-century halfway through the over, and now I didn't know whether to raise my bat or lift my helmet or what. I also didn't know at the time that the tournament's sponsor, Johnnie Walker, had put up a one-million-dollar prize for anyone who managed this feat. The guys in the dressing room had cottoned on to
