everyone's time has to come, but I still believe that Graeme and I remain the best two openers for the Proteas in limited-overs cricket.

As far as the 2011 World Cup is concerned, I think there's still time to experiment with the squad of 16 players that have been selected. I reckon they should give some of the younger guys a chance to put their hands up in the run-up to the World Cup. I think, for example, that David Miller deserved his call-up to the 2010 West Indies tour – he had a really good domestic season for the Dolphins.

Dropping Mark Boucher was a contentious issue. Look, I understand the selectors' dilemma – if someone hasn't been scoring runs for a while, they need to be dropped. The same has applied to me. Stats don't lie, and it's been a while since Bouch has been able to consistently finish a game the way he used to. On the other hand, can we really do without the kind of bulldog, never-say-die attitude Bouch brings to the team? Not to mention the guy's massive experience. Remember too that by sticking the gloves on AB, the team is now deprived of our best fielder. I mean, point – where AB normally held station – is such a valuable position in one-day cricket.

There have also been a few calls for Graeme's head. Although he does have some faults as a captain, as I'm sure he would admit, you have to consider who his potential replacements would be. Jacques Kallis is the current vice-captain, but he is not captain material, seriously. The main contender has to be our new T20 captain Johan Botha, who did a great job leading us against Australia in January 2009. Without Graeme and Jacques, we beat the Aussies 4-1 in their own backyard.

I still find it hard to understand why Botha wasn't made vice-captain after that series instead of Jacques. As captain he was genuinely impressive – very confident and outspoken on the field. I think he lost a little confidence in the subsequent ODI series in India in February 2010 when we lost 1-2, but I think now he's got his confidence back. And I thought he bowled really well at the recent T20 World Cup. Botha's a complete cricketer. He's fit, he's hungry and he knows what he wants to do on the field. Most importantly, like Hansie, Johan never gets too close to the other players. The selectors have clearly shown confidence in him by awarding him the T20 job after Graeme stood down, and I think he would make a great 50-over captain as well.

The World Cup is being held in India, which means that you need at least two spinners. There's no one pushing Johan Botha or Roelof van der Merwe