I've also set up some routines with my teammates. In the 2006 series against New Zealand, played in South Africa, Ashwell Prince and I planned a little celebration for when one of us took a catch. When one of us caught the ball, the other one would run over and pretend to start taking photos. I happened to take a catch against the Black Caps at SuperSport Park in Centurion, and Ashwell duly came running over with his imaginary camera.

And in the West Indies during the ODI series in 2005, I was standing inside the circle – at short extra cover – when Chris Gayle hit one in the screws off Makhaya Ntini's bowling. Somehow I managed to dive and pluck the ball out of the air with only one hand. It was one of those catches that you take but you don't quite know how the hell you did it. That was probably one of the best I've ever taken. All I did though, once I had got up off the ground, was to turn towards the crowd and put my finger to my lips in a gesture of silence.

I did it on the spur of the moment. I could have run around the ground celebrating like a nutcase – I was certainly entitled to, given the nature of the catch I had just pulled off – but instead I just jogged back towards the middle. Most of the guys were running after Makhaya anyway. Whenever he took a wicket, he would peel off and run across the field, even if one of us had taken the catch to help him get his wicket. That was just Makhaya's way of celebrating – I think he picked it up from Curtly Ambrose, who did something similar in the latter part of his career.

Actually, I think Makhaya saw himself as a West Indian a lot of the time – especially when he was in the West Indies. He'd suddenly develop this West Indian accent. Makhaya is a funny guy, and he always looked like he was enjoying his cricket. He always had a smile on his face.

Wayne Parnell and I also had a little something worked out if either of us pulled something off in the third ODI against the Poms in Cape Town in November 2009. Although I was twelfth man for that game, it so happened that I was on the field when our plan came off. Both Wayne and I are WWF wrestling fans, so we decided to emulate a wrestler by the name of Batista. This oke is huge – he's probably the biggest chap in the business – and he's got these big tattoos over his shoulders and on his back, with massive muscles bulging everywhere. Actually, it's hard to believe that the oke is actually human and not a computer-generated cartoon.

Anyway, so whenever Batista walks out to the ring, he pretends he's mowing everyone down with a massive machine gun. Wayne and I decided
