Me … and my game

There’s not a whole lot of difference between the two, actually. I’m impulsive, I like the limelight and I’m flashy. But I also have a big heart and I’m pretty generous. On the pitch I go for the big shots and I also often get out to rash shots. But I’ve also scored a lot of runs …

Me …

Look up the phrase ‘what you see is what you get’, and you’ll find the name ‘Herschelle Gibbs’ written next to it.

And this is what you get …

I’m always going to go for it. It’s that simple. Whether it is on or off the pitch, it’s been balls-to-the-wall in everything I’ve tried. ‘Live life to the max’ has pretty much been my mantra. With this default setting and an outgoing personality, I’ve had a lot of fun in my life. I’m also a pretty generous guy, both with my money and my time. And that’s not a boast. Lord knows, it’s got me into trouble often enough.

I find it impossible to refuse a drink bought for me by a cricket supporter or not to sign an autograph or talk cricket with my fans. And I don’t refuse a drink simply because I never say no to a drink (as I know some of you wise guys might think), but because I feel a strong obligation to engage with cricket supporters. It’s more than an obligation or a duty, actually; I really enjoy it. Similarly, and to my detriment, I’ve been way too generous with my money, often showering girls with gifts and all too regularly picking up the bill when I’m out with people.

Of course there are some downsides to my go-large-or-go-home attitude. Being a spontaneous person means that I’ve often not thought things through before making a decision. Frankly, my spontaneity has often landed
