I have a warm relationship with my dad. I might not speak to him every day, but we do chat and he's always willing to help me out. He will pick me up at the airport and he comes by my house twice a week to open up for my domestic worker. If I have to get something done, he'll organise it for me. But we don't really speak too deeply about what's on my mind or in my heart. We keep our relationship on a very even keel.

My dad's always allowed me to do things my way. He let me learn how to manage my own life. And so I've never really spoken to him much about the mistakes that I've made. It might sound a little strange to some people, but I think it stems from the days when I had my first real girlfriend. My dad was against the relationship from the start, and from then on I wouldn't speak to my parents about my personal feelings at all. So, ja, my dad and I chat a lot about sport and life in general, but we don't discuss anything personal.

I have a lot to thank my dad for: he provided me with the opportunity to become a professional cricketer. The guy had obviously busted his ass off to get my sister and me into private schools – my sister Lucinda went to Springfield. The Bishops bursary was my ticket to professional sport. I might have made it had I remained at St Joseph's College, but as good as St Joseph's was, it simply wasn't in the same league as Bishops. At Bishops I played sport against all the top youngsters in the country, and my successes got me recognised very quickly.

I see my sister Lucinda every now and then. She has her own busy life as a tennis coach, but again, we never talk too much about our private lives and I don't really know what she's up to. I have a half-brother too – Clinton Crayenstein – from my mom's first marriage, and he and I are pretty close.

I'd say we're a warm, loving family, but it's not your typical family. Both my sister and I have been on the road for so long with our sport that we were never able to develop a close bond. And because my parents are now divorced, we never get together as one big family. My parents still speak, but I can never get them together socially. My mom's completely against my dad's girlfriend, so if I had to invite my dad for a braai, he would have to come on his own, without his girlfriend. So, ja, it's a little different.

At Harmony, you are required to write your life story. The counsellors give you guidelines on how to approach the task, and when you've finished writing it, you have to read your story to your group. If the guys feel that
