Eventually Tenielle says, ‘No, I’m not going home. Take me to my parents’ place in Camps Bay.’ By then I’d realised that I had pushed things too far and was in a fair amount of kak, so I took her to her folks. Her dad comes out of the house and I give him this whole speech about how I know he’s obviously going to stick up for his daughter, but all I was trying to do was drive home and she was shouting so loudly that I couldn’t take it any more and she was then trying to push the steering wheel and I was sort of preventing her. Basically all that sort of crap. I was angry and said they should just take my car and that I would walk home.

It’s a long way from Camps Bay to Green Point.

Fortunately her dad was like, ‘No, no, don’t be silly. Let’s all just go home. Everything will be okay in the morning.’ They’re great people, Tenielle’s folks. Very loving and understanding people.

Another big fight occurred at our house one night. We were giving a braai for some friends, and, again, I had plenty to drink. Tenielle and I would fight a lot about stupid little things, but never when I was sober. This particular evening we ended up having a huge argument in the bedroom. It got very physical. No hitting – I never hit her, or any other woman, for that matter. We were sort of pushing each other. One of my mates had to come in to see whether things weren’t getting out of hand.

There was also an ‘incident’ with celebrity model Minki van der Westhuizen, which happened at former Miss Universe Michelle McLean’s engagement party. The next day Tenielle said to me, ‘You know, last night … do you remember what happened? You tried to kiss Minki right in front of me.’

I’m like, ‘What? Really?’

I didn’t remember a thing. Funny things happen to me when I get pissed.

The whole drunk-driving incident in March 2008 was a perfect example …

Tenielle and I went to Pigalle in Green Point for supper, because she had been saying to me that I never wanted to go out with her, just with the boys, and that we never went out and enjoyed ourselves together. So I said, cool. I remember it was a Thursday night, and Thursdays at Pigalle are generally good.

I had a few bottles of wine over supper and decided, no, we were now going to go to a bar in Camps Bay called Ignite. Where I proceeded to get slaughtered. Apparently, a bunch of students kept on buying me shooters. I
