Perhaps not the classiest way to end a relationship, I guess, but I had to let her know where my head was as soon as possible, rather than wait to tell her when I got back to South Africa.

My phone rang as soon as Tenielle got the SMS. And again I said, 'Listen, this is it. I've been thinking about it, and when I come back, I want a divorce.' I remember her saying okay, perhaps she should move out and we should separate for a while. We hardly spoke again during the IPL, and then after the tournament I was only in South Africa for a week before I had to travel to England to play county cricket for Glamorgan.

During that week, though, Tenielle and I met and had a pretty traumatic discussion. Ja, it wasn't nice. She cried a lot, not believing that I wanted to split up or even understanding why I wanted to end our relationship. She kept on asking, 'Why?' and said that she'd gladly work with me through all my issues and concerns. I hated seeing her cry – I hate seeing anybody cry, for that matter – but I was determined. I just said, 'No, I've put you through enough.' I told her that it wasn't appropriate to carry on and that she should try to find somebody who could make her completely happy. Tenielle didn't take it very well. It might be a little bit selfish of me to say this, but I still think I made the right decision to get out.

So I set off for Glamorgan, Tenielle moved out, and Donné and Peter Whelan sorted things out. Ironically, the day I landed in London to play county cricket was 8 July, our one-year wedding anniversary …

The divorce went through on the grounds of 'irreconcilable differences'.

If you read the papers in that time, you will know that the saga didn't quite end there, though. Tenielle took me to court, demanding some very sizeable amounts of money – in the region of R100 000 a month. Clearly she was either smoking her socks or she and her lawyer were using that amount as a bargaining tool. It was money that she would never be able to get. I wasn't even worth half of what they made out.

Unfortunately, the press depicted Tenielle as a bit of a gold digger, which was basically a load of rubbish. She wasn't at fault. She did nothing wrong in our marriage and did not deserve what I had put her through. Although I wasn't in the country when the story went down, I heard about it, and I can tell you that Tenielle isn't the person the media made her out to be. The divorce was entirely my fault. I know how hard it had been for Tenielle and how bad she was feeling. For her, marriage was supposed to be a lifelong commitment, and she was exceptionally hurt by the divorce. Obviously she
