China underwent a civilizational change with the communist revolution. India will need a near-civilizational change too: not back to some golden, almost mythical era but forward to a society that is more equal, experimental, and ecological. These are not just feel-good values; they are the essential attributes of a society that wants to imagine and accrue power in the twenty-first century.