He makes writing these kinds of books look easy. I know now that it is by no means easy! In 2012, he nominated me to the Rockefeller Bellagio Center for a six-week stint where I worked on a more academic book on India–China relations. This book owes something to the beautiful surroundings and the calm of the Center, the other Fellows in residence, and the tremendous support of the staff. I want to record my thanks to everyone there during those idyllic days.

I could not have written the book without the always cheerful and unstinting help of Esther Yeoh, Serene Teang, Byron Chong, and Jassie Cheng at the Centre on Asia and Globalisation at the LKY School. Esther and Serene keep the Centre humming along administratively so that I hardly need to do anything beyond signing a few papers. Byron is invaluable as a research assistant and read the entire manuscript with a sharp eye. Jassie, our most recent addition to the Centre, brings a quiet, efficient energy.

Finally, since I have not said it before in print, the LKY School is a wonderful academic home, and I will always be grateful for having packed my bags and come here back in 2011.
