reads in the Indian media to produce its own brand of 'self-righteous anxieties'.[77]

Shen and Chowdhary's analysis of the Chinese social media during the Doklam crisis of 2017 gauges more popular opinion. Strikingly, most of the themes that Shen had identified in his 2011 study feature again. Indians are derogatorily referred to as 'ah san' (a racist term). India's actions at Doklam show that 'Indians are arrogant, inefficient, have been uncompromising on border negotiations, and filled with hatred and suspicion since the 1962 war'. Indian 'bullying' must be opposed – and more: 'While facing India, we should not just defend, but also make a strategic plan to dismember it.' India's moves in Doklam are evidently part of a China containment strategy in league with the US and Japan: 'Indians listen to whatever Captain America says.'[78]

On the other hand, Shen and Chowdhary suggest that Indian business reporting and Chinese social media on Bollywood films contain more positive messaging. In the second decade of the new millennium, as the economic relationship deepened, Indian newspapers increasingly featured positive stories about the benefits of trade and the theme of 'partnership' between the two countries. By the end of the decade, even this positive message had frayed, as the trade deficit was portrayed as another form of Chinese predation. In response, the Global Times dismissively urged Indians to complain less and 'work harder if you want to catch up'.[79] While there is little Indian engagement with Chinese movies – perhaps only martial arts movies with Jackie Chan draw an audience in India – Shen and Chowdhary show that Bollywood has a following in China. For example, the Indian film star Aamir Khan has achieved crossover appeal. His Weibo account has 1.25 million followers and garners largely positive posts. His hit film 3 Idiots sold 11 million tickets. Despite some resentment over depictions of China and over India's growing soft power, a segment of Chinese viewers commended films such as 3 Idiots, Dangal, Secret Superstar, Bajrangi Bhaijan, Hindi Medium, and Hichki. For some Chinese viewers, the films opened a window into Indian life, stimulated
