and mutual benefit; and peaceful coexistence. India was accused of violating the third principle, mutual non-interference.[64]

Was India subverting Tibet's integration?

Was China justified in its campaign against India and Nehru? Garver's careful assessment is that China got it mostly wrong. Delhi did, as we saw earlier, allow the Dalai Lama and Tibetan refugees to live in India, and it did provide some encouragement to the Dalai Lama and his followers in their resistance. It is true also that India did tacitly cooperate with the US. It was likely aware of US links to the Tibetans in India, especially in Kalimpong, where a command centre of the Tibetan rebels was based.[65] However, much of the US activity in Tibet was conducted from Nepal and Pakistan, not India, as Delhi was thought to be opposed to overt American operations from its soil.[66]

As against this record of aiding and abetting the Tibetan resistance, Garver argues, there was India's helpfulness to China on Tibet. This included rejecting moves in the UN to discuss Tibet and a US call in 1960 for Tibetan 'self-determination'. Indeed, Nehru took the opposite view from the US, repeatedly saying in public that Tibet was part of China. In addition, in 1956, as noted earlier, he persuaded the Dalai Lama to withdraw his appeal for political asylum and to go back to Tibet. In 1959–60, he discouraged Tibetan authorities from approaching the UN (they did anyway – and India abstained on the vote). Beijing berated Nehru for giving the Dalai Lama asylum, but Nehru had had little choice. Domestic and international opinion would have turned massively against him. Interestingly, Nehru thought that China had signalled it would accept the Dalai Lama's stay in India – in remarks that Zhou had made to him as early as 1950 and repeated in 1954 and 1960.[67]

More importantly, Garver argues that China simply did not understand Nehru's motives on Tibet. At the core of his approach was that Tibetan autonomy was a vital Indian interest. This was not just because India had
