

Figure 2.4 Detail of Herberg's fieldwork in central and southern Ghur, c. 1970s. From Herberg 1982: II.

Aside from Ahangaran and Jam-Firuzkuh, many other architectural remains dot historical Ghur's central–southern stretches (Figures 2.5–2.11), being generally scattered with few discernible areas of concentration. The photographic documentation in Ghur in the 1960s by the intrepid traveler-photographer Josephine Powell (mentioned in this volume's Introduction), and architectural surveys by the scholars Werner Herberg and Warwick Ball in the 1960s and 1970s,[32] reveal a cultivable but rugged landscape. In Herberg's (Figure 2.4) survey of the structures still standing at various locations spanning from north of the Farah Rud through the southern areas beyond the Rud-i Ghur, he observed that in general they rarely stood atop peaks or inclines, but commonly at the bases of cliffs and protectively flanking passages through valleys (Figure 2.5).[33] At times multiple structures were also grouped together, so that they could have enclosed (partly or completely) cultivable areas or pastures (Figure 2.6).