contingent factors helped determine their adoption of some Perso-Islamic mores – such as a fabricated pre-Islamic genealogy emerging from mythical ancient Iran – alongside their continued adherence to indigenous and non-Islamic traditions ensuing from the cultural economies of transhumance/nomadism.

Notes

1. Asif 2016: 22 (see also below in main text).
2. For Qabacha see Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 418–421 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 531–544).
3. Juzjani related the anecdote of a courtier pointing out – rather audaciously – that the sultan's lack of sons meant his legacies had no heirs, to which the sultan replied, "[While] to other sultans are [born] one or two sons, several thousand are [born] to me, meaning the Turk slaves [bandagan], who will inherit my kingdoms, and [they] will read the khutba in my name." Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 410–411 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 497); and Allegranzi 2019a, vol. I: 46. See also Kumar (2007: 86ff.) for a description of the marital alliances among the Turk *ghulam*s presiding over the eastern territories (including Delhi), which were instituted by Mu'izz al-Din as the "patriarch" to mimic Islamic marital practices – i.e., paternal cousin marriage – and establish inter-generational allegiances. Cf. also Chapter 6.
4. Asif 2016: 22.
5. Kufi (trans. Fredunbeg) 1900: esp. 95–98, 154–157; Siddiqui 2010: 28–29, 34–35; Asif 2016: 14, 86–92.
6. Habib (2017: 108), in his review of Asif's book, adduced detailed evidence maintaining Chach-nama as a translation of an earlier Arabic text; he summarized as "a questionable thesis" the notion that it was Kufi's original composition.
7. Cf. esp. Asif 2016: 2–12 and passim.
8. The previously unknown geographical and historical origins of many communities in Afghanistan are gradually receiving attention. For example, the widespread Ghorbat of Afghanistan – found in pockets spanning Sistan through Qunduz, and Badghis to Jalalabad – were the subjects of a fascinating anthropological study by Aparna Rao (1982). The author explored the possibility of this and the Indian jaṭ origins of five other tribal confederacies. Although the antiquity of the Ghorbat's self-created ethnogenesis is unknown, it is noteworthy that they also subscribed to descent from Shah-nama heroes (cf. Rao 1982: 41). One of the study's important contributions is its documentation of the negative connotations that jaṭ origins have throughout Afghanistan, principally due to their nomadism (rather than their supposedly foreign origins). Indeed, Bosworth (2011: 17) highlighted the contradictory descriptions of Inner Asian Oghüz confederations in Arabic geographies, whose authors characterized them as "purely steppe dwellers in felt tents, with no towns," even though substantial settlements of Turks and (Muslim) Iranians were not uncommon in the same regions.
9. Cf. Amin 2002: 30; and Introduction.