and Bamiyan Shansabanis, and the significance of cultural production by means of elite patronage.

5. See esp. Thomas's (2018: 146–150) overview of the debates surrounding the identification of Firuzkuh as the enigmatic Shansabani "capital"; cf. also Chapter 2.
6. As discussed infra in the main text, doubts regarding precise locations persist despite – again – O'Neal's (2016a) excellent mapping of the known Shansabani-associated toponyms. Cf. also O'Neal 2013: 16.
7. See Chapter 2, for Jam-Firuzkuh's integration into regional commercial networks, thanks in large part to the mercantile Jewish community established there as of the eleventh century, prior to Shansabani presence. Cf. also Juzjani, vol. I, 1963: 336 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 339); O'Neal, 2016a; Thomas 2018: 216.
8. See O'Neal 2016b for Wajiristan's location; also Leshnik's (1968: 47–48) discussion of Warshada in relation to Firuzkuh, etc.; and Thomas 2018: 39–41. M. Ashtiany, the commentator on Baihaqi's surviving text (most recently translated by Bosworth), also confronted the puzzling mentions of place names, noting that "the accounts of the Ghaznavid campaigns into Ghur provide considerable onomastic and topographical information, whose significance is unfortunately now obscure" (cf. Baihaqi [trans. Bosworth] vol. III, 2011: 97–98). In his copious commentary on Juzjani's text, Raverty (1881: 339, n. 8) noted other historical writers' (though specifically citing only the seventeenth-century Burhan-i Qati') mentions of Istiya, which was "the name of one of the mountains … between Ghaznin and Hirat" – still too large a swath of the country to identify the locality, probably a mountain fortress. However, the apparent extension of the Istiya appanage to include Tiginabad during Shihab al-Din's (later Sultan Mu'izz al-Din) possession of the latter would indicate its location somewhere in southern Ghur, near the garm-sir of Zamindawar and Tiginabad/Old Qandahar (cf. Bosworth [1977] 1992: 122; O'Neal 2016a; and infra in main text). Furthermore, the location of Madin could have been in either northeastern Ghur, within the ambit of Kashi, or in the northwest near Gharjistan: the unsuccessful rebellion c. AH 547/ 1152–1153 CE and attempted occupation of Firuzkuh during 'Ala' al-Din's "imprisonment" by the Saljuq Sultan Sanjar (r. AH 512–552/1118–1157 CE) – when he actually served as the Sanjar's boon companion – apparently originated near Kashi, and the usurping claimant to the seat was "Malik Nasir al-Din Husain, son of Muhammad of Madin, who was the son of the brother of 'Ala' al-Din." Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 348 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 361–362); see also below in main text. It may be more likely, however, that Madin abutted Gharjistan, as Saif al-Din Muhammad's (r. AH 556–558/1161–1163 CE) campaign against the Oghüz, who were encroaching from the northwest, took him to Gharjistan and Madin. See Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 352 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 367 and n. 5).
9. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 336, 337 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 339, 341). See Ball 2019: No. 468, for a brief site description and map, as well as an invaluable bibliography.
10. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 375–376 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 403–404, 405). Even a cursory comparison between Raverty's nineteenth-century translation of this passage and my own here makes apparent the need for a fresh examination and trans-