Yamini sultans, frequently characterized as "Iranized Turks" (ibid., 75) due to their extensive movements across far-flung tracts and occasional residence within "textile architecture." The sultans' movements also combined seasonal transhumance with military expeditions (ibid., 89).

82. The modern city (Shahr-i Nau) swallowed within it the quadrangular, walled city laid out by Ahmad Shah Durrani *c.*1755, itself replacing Nadirabad, the garrison established by the warlord Nadir Shah Afshar (d. 1747) in the 1730s as he was on his way to plunder the Mughal treasury in Shahjahanabad (Old Delhi). Cf. N. Dupree 1977: 279ff.; Matthee and Mashita [2010] 2012); and infra in notes.
83. Symptomatic of the multiple and changing names of Old Qandahar is its sobriquet "Shahr-i Kuhna," which is also applied to a locality outside the city of Farah (Farah Province), and to another site in the region of Zamindawar (Helmand Province): cf. Ball 2008: 228–233; Ball 2019: Nos. 522, 1047; and Chapter 2. For the time frame of the present study, Ball's (1988) observations are important to bear in mind: the Old Persian Harahuvatish for the entire region was Hellenized as Arachosia, and in turn Arabicized as al-Rukhkhaj in early geographies (ninth–tenth centuries). Likely due to the Turkic Ghaznavids' presence in the area, the locality came to be called Tiginabad as of the eleventh century. It was not until the thirteenth century that the name "Qandahar" was applied to the city. Cf. Ball 1996: 400–401; Ball, pers. comm., February 2018; Bosworth 2012b.
84. For the presence of an eighth-century 'Umayyad coin hoard in the Qaitul vihara, see Helms (1982: 14), who further noted the possible "spiritual coexistence" of the local Zun/Zhun cult plausibly dedicated to a solar deity, Buddhism and Islam. See also Helms 1983; Ball 1996: 399; Errington 2017: 43; and Chapter 2 notes. The extensive documentation and analysis of the Qaitul Buddhist complex unfortunately still awaits publication, even though the British Institute for Afghan Studies conducted surveys and excavations throughout the entire area – encompassing both the Old Qandahar citadel and the stupa overlooking it – in their 1974–1978 seasons (Ball, pers. comm., February 2018).
85. Ball (1988: 135–137) proposed that, given the appearance of the locale's name as "Qandahar" only in sources dating from the thirteenth century and later, the Shansabanis could have initiated the name change: the association of "Tiginabad" with the recognizably Turkic presence of their enemies the Ghaznavids surely spurred the Shansabanis to appropriate the site by means of naming it with a term rooted in discernibly local Persianate traditions, both as a sign of victory and of their own induction into a prominence outside their ancestral Ghur. But the fact that Juzjani referred to the location only as Tiginabad, making no mention whatsoever of Qandahar, would indicate that the name change did not originate with the Shansabanis, but probably later than the sparse traces of their presence there (see infra in main text).
86. Cf. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 243 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 111). Nevertheless, the debate surrounding whether Qandahar and Tiginabad are one and the same needs "considerable … work … before [it] can be put to bed": Ball (pers. comm.,
