

Figure I.3 Tiginabad/Old Qandahar, grave with brick vault. From Whitehouse 1976: fig. IIa.

built new monuments (Figure I.7). Notably, it appears to have been their entry into the north Indian duab in the later AH 580s/1190s CE that signaled new, monumental patronage in palatial (Figures I.8 and I.9) as well as religious ambits (Figures I.10 and I.11) – both replete with identifiably reused building materials. At the same time, in Herat the Shansabanis left distinct traces within the renowned, centuries-old congregational mosque complex (Figures I.12 and I.13), addorsing to its northeastern perimeter the tomb (no longer extant) of Sultan Ghiyath al-Din Muhammad ibn Sam (r. AH 558–599/1163–1203 CE; see Volume II) (Figures I.14 and I.15).

Although the imperial Shansabanis achieved and maintained their greatest territorial extent for only about two decades (c.1192–1210 CE), this was nonetheless a feat rarely seen for almost a millennium: in the first centuries of the Common Era, the Kushanas brought ancient Bactria,