20. Juzjani vol. I, 1963: 362 (trans. vol. I, 1881: 384). For the Karrami Qur'an, see Flood 2009a: 96; Flood 2009b. Thomas (2018: 122) briefly discussed the overall complex; as always, Ball (2019: No. 1023) has provided the most thorough bibliography of the site.
21. For the Ghaznavids, see, e.g., Bulliet 1972: 63–64, 68–70; Malamud 1994: 45–46. For Saljuq-period negotiations of sectarian rivalries, see Bulliet 1972: 72–74; Peacock 2010: 104ff.; Peacock 2015: 268–272.
22. See below in main text for possibly indirect infiltrations of the orthodox *madhhab*s into more remote areas, possibly via Sufi networks. Given the founder Muhammad ibn Karram's proselytizing origins in Sistan – though he might have been born in Mecca – it is possible that he made his way from Sistan to Khurasan via Ghur and Gharjistan, reportedly entering the great Khurasani emporium of Nishapur with a following of "weavers and others from depressed classes." See esp. Bosworth 1973: 165, 185–186; Melchert 2001; also Zysow 2011/2012: pt i.
23. Bosworth 1973: 185–186.
24. See also Bosworth [1960] 1977 (reprint): 1–2.
25. Bosworth (1961: 128ff.) initially put forward the idea that Mahmud dispatched Karrami preceptors into Ghur, but see also Malamud 1994: 47; Zysow 2011/2012: pt ii; and Chapter 3. These later Karrami "missionaries," then, quite possibly entered the region with such information as might have been preserved ever since a century before or more.
26. Cf. Bosworth 1973: 188–189; Malamud 1994: 39–43 and notes.
27. See Bosworth [1960] 1977: 8; also Zysow (2011/2012: pt iv) for a discussion of early concordances among Karramis, Shafi'is and Hanafis, as well as eventual divergences between the Karramiyya and other *madhhab*s. It is also important to bear in mind that, prior to the thirteenth century, as many as several hundred lesser known or lost theological sects were active throughout the central Islamic lands, and that the four *madhhab*s now accepted as "orthodox" crystallized and came to be considered as such only by the later 1200s. Cf. Makdisi 1971: 77; Makdisi 1981: 2ff.
28. Cf. Bosworth 1973: 183. According to Nizami (1998: 370–371), Ghur and Gharjistan were already crowded fields for proselytizers by the early twelfth century: in addition to the Karramiyya, disciples of the mystic 'Abd al-Qadir Gilani (d. AH 561/1166 CE) were also active in these same areas.
29. Recently, the minar of Jam-Firuzkuh has not only been re-dated from AH 590/1193–1194 CE to AH 570/1174–1175 CE, it has also been compellingly identified as a Karramiyya-inspired monument, particularly its unique epigraphic program (Sourdel-Thomine 2004: 156; cf. further citations below in main text and notes). The architectural typology of the minar versus the madrasa, however, sets the structures apart, as discussed infra (main text).
30. See esp. Tritton 1957: 98–100, 102–108; Sourdel-Thomine 1976; Pedersen, pt i and Hillenbrand pt iii in Pedersen et al. 2012; Zysow 2011/2012: pt ii. Melchert (2001: 237) in fact cited al-Maqdisi's (fl. 985) characterization of the Karramiyya as al-khanaqa'iyyun. It is noteworthy that, well into the twelfth century, textual sources also included *ribat*s as sites of instruction, not only in smaller towns but also in larger cities such as Baghdad; at times a communal