and the succeeding several centuries when the descendants of the Mongols – e.g., the Negüderi, or Qaraunas – held sway from Ghazna eastward. Cf. Bernardini 2020: 251–252; and infra in this chapter.

63. Pinder-Wilson 2001: 165. See esp. Bosworth [1977] 1992: 6ff. This "sequel" to the same author's earlier publication on the Ghaznavids (1973) essentially began with the Saljuq defeat of the Ghaznavid forces at Dandanqan, which arguably brought to an end the expansionist momentum set by Mahmud and continued by Mas'ud I. During the following eighteen years, thanks to heavy-handed Saljuq meddling in Ghaznavid succession, six Ghaznavid princes vied for the title of sultan either as claimants or actual rulers. Thereafter, the combined reigns of Ibrahim (r. AH 451–492/1059–1099 CE) and his son Mas'ud III (r. AH 492–509/1099–1115 CE) – ostensibly a long and seemingly stable period of more than a half-century – again resulted in short and contested successions (see also de Bruijn 1983: 34, 59). As noted above in the main text, the Shansabanis sacked Ghazna in AH 545/1150 CE. It is probable that the Oghüz occupation of Ghazna began as early as 1160, since Khusrau Malik (r. AH 555–582/1160–1186 CE) was apparently crowned sultan at Lahore. Cf. Bosworth [1977] 1992: 82ff., 123–131.
64. See Pinder-Wilson 2001: 166; Ball and Fischer 2019: 477–478. Mas'ud III's minar was most likely associated with an adjoining mosque, and also threw its shadow on the large Ghaznavid palace (R. Giunta, pers. comm., July 2018), discussed in Chapter 5. The precedent of commemorating a military victory with the erection of a minar – in association with a mosque – appears to have been firmly set already by Mahmud of Ghazna, who, according to Iltutmish's (r. AH 618–633/1221–1236 CE at Delhi) court poet Fakhr-i Mudabbir Mubarakshah (d. AH 625/1228 CE), commemorated what was likely his Kanauj victory of AH 409/1018–1019 CE by building a minar in Lahore (see Flood 2002: 103–107, also for the poet's mistake in the date of the campaign). Due to Lahore's millennium-long urban development, neither the minar nor its surrounding context is traceable. Based on surviving towers – e.g., at Ghazna, Jam-Firuzkuh, and Delhi – it is probable that the Lahore minar was associated with a mosque at some point, though the latter may not have been constructed simultaneously, as was the case at Jam-Firuzkuh and Delhi (cf. also A. N. Khan 1988: 304; Chapters 3 and 5; and Volume II for Delhi).
65. Evidently the Sura in its entirety appeared again in Isfahan, around the courtyard of the Imami madrasa, in AH 741(?)/1340(?) CE. See Dodd and Khairallah 1981: II:118; and supra in notes.
66. Cf. Y. Godard 1936: 367–369; Godard and Smith 1937: 351; Pinder-Wilson 2001: 158.
67. Cf. Edwards 1991: 64.
68. Blair 1985: 83. The madrasa's funerary aspect – probably memorializing Sultan Saif al-Din (r. AH 556–558/1161–1163 CE), as noted supra in main text – would have very aptly combined with commemorating the fateful military victory on the heels of which he was assassinated.
69. Again, Thomas (2018: 122–123) briefly addressed the complex, but inaccurately states that it was "sponsored by Ghiyath al-Din" (cf. infra in main text). Ball (2019: No. 212) considered the two structures together, the western one being