attested verses in funerary inscriptions (all on marble) of [Ghazna] during the Ghaznavid and Ghurid eras."

78. Cf. RCEA, vol. 5 (1934) Nos. 1652, 1824, 1831, 1837, 1881, 1896; RCEA, vol. 6 (1935) Nos. 2052, 2058, 2061, 2094, 2119, 2135, 2143,2145, 2183, 2190, 2194, 2196, 2200, 2205, 2206, 2211, 2218, 2315, 2327, 2332, 2343, 2350, 2351, 2354, 2361, 2363, 2371, 2372, 2383, 2399. See also Appendix, Afghanistan III: 5d. It is noteworthy that verses falling within this range of Surat al-Iklhas (Q. CXII) were prominently quoted both on the renovations I have assigned to Mu'izz al-Din at Lashkari Bazar, and on the tomb attributed to Ahmad Kabir in the lower Indus region – cf. Appendix, Afghanistan VIII: 4; Pakistan III: 6, 20, 22; see also Chapters 5 and 6.
79. For a possible interaction between the Karramiyya and emergent Sufi orders during the eleventh century – specifically the commonality in *khanqah*s between the two broad groups – see Trimingham 1971: 6–7; and esp. Böwering and Melvin-Koushki [2010] 2012: phase I. Modern and contemporary documentations of transhumant and nomadic communities have taken note of their interactions with spiritual centers or *khanaqah*s in the course of their migrations: e.g., Khazeni (2012: 137, 147–148) noted the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century visitations of shrines by Türkman nomads; Utas 1980: 64; Amiri 2020: 152–155. See also infra in main text.
80. Cf. Nizami 1998: 369. Precisely because of the described variety of origins and practices among Sufi masters as well as devotees (see supra in main text), a vast vocabulary accreted over time to refer to them: see esp. Ernst 1992: 5, 11; Green 2012: 8. Although removed in time from the twelfth century, Anooshahr's (2017) study of the Sufi Sheikh Muhammad Gauth Gwaliyari (fl. sixteenth century) of the Shattari order provides a fascinating example of the dissemination of a Sufi tariqa, in this case from early Safavid Iran to Mughal India, the shift in political engagement of the order over time and space, and some of the truly idiosyncratic rituals prescribed for gaining political power. For the Shattari silsila, see also Nizami 1998: 378–379.
81. See, inter alia, esp. Nizami 1961: 182–184; Nizami 1998: 377–378; Böwering [1991] 2011; Ernst and Lawrence 2002: 19ff; Auer, EI^{3} (2016).
82. The lack of association between the monumental Chisht remains and the Chishtiyya would be further underscored by their purported adherence to poverty and eschewal of political connections, which presented a stark contrast to the Suhrawardiyya, for example. Cf. Nizami 1961: 177–180, 240–243; Trimingham 1971: 65–66; and Chapter 6. After Diez in 1924, Maricq and Wiet (1959: 69–70) were the second European scholars to analyze (however briefly) Chisht's architectural ruins and their inscriptions, but connecting the Chishtiyya only to the town rather than the remains of the monumental complex. Sourdel-Thomine (2004: 155) apparently drew the first direct association between the coalescing Sufi order and the ruined complex. See also Flood 2009a: 96–102. Nevertheless, this circumstantially derived and, in the end, most likely inaccurate association was already operative as of the later 1970s, e.g., in Utas' semi-anthropological fieldwork on Sufi orders in Afghanistan (Utas 1980: 65). Although circumspect, Blair (1985: 81–84) also implied an association of the Chishtiyya with the two surviving structures at
