

Figure 5.22 Lashkari Bazar, South Palace, Oratory F, mihrab.
From Sourdel-Thomine 1978: pl. 147b.

building: the Tomb of Sadan Shahid (late twelfth century) near the city of Multan in the middle-Indus region.[48]

Equally noteworthy are all four verses of Q. CXII, which were common primarily in epitaphs from around the western Indian Ocean; however, as discussed in Chapter 4, the Sura tended to be absent in the eastern Islamicate world or the Persianate lands through at least the early twelfth century. It was as of the 1160s that the verses appeared at Chisht, inside the western domed structure associated with the Firuzkuh Shansabanis – perhaps appropriately, as the complex likely had funerary associations. Finally, the abundant use of doxologies, which helped to create the decorative horror vacui of Shansabani-patronized structures, had been well attested from the mid-twelfth century onward.

Thus, it would appear that Q. XLVIII's first several verses, along with the four verses of Q. CXII (often repeated) had become familiar to the Firuzkuh Shansabanis, and were also employed thereafter in the Lashkari Bazar renovations, which were within the purview of Sultan Mu'izz al-Din